

The statement `scanf("%d", number);` is almost correct, but it has a small issue. The `scanf` function expects the address of the variable where it should store the value read from the user. In this case, `number` should be passed as a pointer using the `&` operator because `scanf` needs to know the memory location where the integer value should be stored.