

a. Compiler

A compiler is used to convert high-level programming language code into machine code (or an intermediate code) in a single go. It translates the entire program and produces an executable file that can be run independently. The compiled code can be executed multiple times without the need for recompilation, as opposed to an interpreter that translates code line by line and may require retranslation each time the program is run.